A temporary software connection between two programs or commands. Normally, the operating system accepts input from the keyboard and sends the output to the display screen. Sometimes, however, it is useful to use the output from a command as input to a second command, without passing the data through the keyboard or display screen. Tubes were invented for these situations. One of the best examples of using the pipe is connecting the command that lists files in a directory to a command that sorts the data. By pressing the two commands together, you can view the files in order. In UNIX and DOS, the symbol of This is a vertical bar (|). The DOS command to list files in alphabetical order would be: DIR | SORT SORT SORT
