À© Jamieey Photography His name was Matthew, and his eyes were the color of drowning. The only thing more tempting than the disaster his eyes promised was vague to be straight. When we talk, his hand has always found a reason to land on my shoulder. He sat closer to me than he had to. He joined me on my walks up to the barren river after midnight. We crossed the ghost cities together, talking about whatever thoughts had the audacity to cross our minds. I said things to Matthew I wasn’t even brave enough to say to myself. And when I told her, she looked at me. Matthew saw me. I fell for him the way bodies fall off buildings and bridges. “I’ve decided what we should wear to the costume party tonight”, he said, throwing through a pile of books on my desk. “Have you decided?” “You’ll love it”, he said. And then that smile. “Aristotle and Plato.” “So, TogasÀ ¢ ~ |” “Togas.” Matthew was already on my bed, moving the except so that it could get to the sheets. “Those are my sheets. Get your TOGA sheets,” I said. "But yours matches the color of my eyes." That damn smlie. We left the party He skips back to campus, falling between them both accidentally and on purpose. Every few meters, we had to stop to fix our constantly falling togas. The wind was greedy that night, sneaking his fingers under the cotton shirt to cover a sensation. When we laughed, our echoes wandered in the dark and then wandered back. I said I was out of breath. We found a picnic table out of a bunch of trees. Was there a kiss? I can't remember. I'd like to think so. I would like to think that something preceded me on my knees before him, pebbles and the earth roughly scrapping its knees, as I reached between its spread legs. When my hand found his dick, half hard, not hard enough, I rested my head on his open lap, brushing my lips through the fabric. Such a thin veil between the night and his body. "It won't work," he said, "Oh?" I put it in my mouth then. It didn't work out. "Whisky Dick, it's not you." I've never heard of anything like that. Matteo pulled me up, smiled, and we ran into each other, fixing our togas while explaining the unfortunate phenomenon of fucking whiskey. It was always night; We always moved, in collision, and then, just as quickly, pulling away. Once, he let me shave his pubic hair in the shape of a star. One time, he called me to brag about how he slept with a girl we both knew. We once watched a movie together in my room. He posed on my bed with his head in my knees. I ran my hands through my hair over and over and I thought about how I always wanted to run my hands through a man's hair just like this. Halfway through the movie, some friends knocked on my door. Matthew practically on the other side of the bed. I sat there, stunned for a moment, my hand just leans over the space in which his head had just rested. I walked to the door and let my friends in. They were talking. They were sitting between us on my bed. They were there Night. They were gone. Matthew was gone. When I lay down to sleep, my bed was still slightly warm with the heat of their bodies. Matthew stopped joining me on my night walks, or I stopped inviting him. It's hard to say. We just fell. Occasionally we would steal private moments, laugh, but there was silence between us. Fracture of a haircut of an ending. * * * * My laptop broke, so I was forced to write all my papers in a student computer lab from one day to the next on campus. There must have been 300 or 400 computers in that bright room. In a moment of boredom, I logged on to a cruise site and, very soon, I found myself chatting with a guy who claimed to be in the same computer lab. He described the baseball cap he was wearing, then stood up to see it. I remember thinking you would. I asked a friend who worked at a nearby computer to look at my things, then I went to the bathroom and waited for him at one of the desks. He came in a few minutes later to find me on my knees. It was so hot because he was desperate. After we pulled up her jeans, we switched numbers. We met in that bathroom twice that week. Again, in the computer lab, we were chatting online even though we were sitting in front of the computers right next to each other. It was almost three a.m. Only a few students were in the lab. I knew her body well enough that I could practically see through the pants of the suit she was wearing. I wanted more. He liked me. He knew. He had to know. "It's funny, but I don't know, man", he wrote. "Yeah, you know," "I don't care." "I'll do it." I pushed my chair back from my and I turned to him. We kept our eyes on each other until he turned on the screen. My eyes stayed exactly where they were. "Tell me you don't like it", I said in a voice. I know perfectly. Tell. He was looking at his screen, but I knew he couldn't see it. I knew it. Heartbeat, eye gouges. I couldn't go back. I got out of my chair and I lay on the floor. I knelt down and said it again. Tell. He grabbed his backpack and left without even bothering to unplug the computer. I don't know how long I kept kneeling, only it was too long. Matthew and I had settled down in the guise of a normal friendship. We went to the same parties, but not together. My hand had long forgotten what it feels like to run through her hair. At a Halloween party, we danced. I knew he was there, somewhere nearby. Everyone we knew was there. Everyone we knew watched as Matthew danced in my arms and squeezed his open mouth against mine. It's not that I didn't want to kiss him. It's just that when we walked away, he didn't look at me. The boy with the eyes the color of drowning kissed me and pulled back to smile at the audience. He could have even punched me. I laughed a perfect laugh, pretended and started dancing again. It took me ten minutes to dance out of the crowd, out of the house, out of the dark. Dark.
