The use of the Guardian or another laser-based anti-missile system on commercial aircraft is probably a question of when, not whether. But until the aircraft have installed the technology, other measures will have to be taken to protect themselves from MANPADS attacks. One important measure is to improve the security of the airport perimeter. Raytheon's Vigilant Eagle program was designed to do just that. A ground-based system that uses a grid of sensors strategically positioned around an airport facility, the Vigilant Eagle is capable of detecting a missile fired at any aircraft arriving or departing within the boundaries of the airport facility. A sensor will detect the missile, sending a signal to another sensor station, which will transmit a microwave beam to destroy the missile guidance system. Not all measures are so expensive. Air traffic procedures can be revised so that jets do not come any closer to runways in gradual descent. By adopting spiral descent models and steep and rapid climbs, commercial aircraft can reduce their vulnerability to modern MANPADS. And for jets that are hit by a missile, those designed with redundant systems and better fire and explosion systems are more likely to survive. The ideal solution to the MANPADS threat, of course, is a combination of systems and strategies. A multi-level approach would make it more difficult for terrorists to launch an effective attack, as they would have to subvert various protective measures. However, this is a formidable challenge, which clearly defines what is at stake in the global war on terror. Just over twenty years ago, cannabis was an illegal drug on all fronts in the United States, at both the federal and state levels. While the federal government has not yet legalized marijuana and still treats it as a controlled substance, a drug, or a chemical, the government regulates on the premise that it can cause abuse or addiction, many state governments have largely approved the therapeutic and recreational use of the drug. States where the use of cannabis in any form remains completely illegal are now in the minority. During the November 2020 election, New Jersey, Arizona, South Dakota and Montana voted to legalize the recreational use of cannabis for adults over the age of 21, and South Dakota and Mississippi also voted to approve the medical use of cannabis. In 2021, New York and Virginia joined the growing group of states that legalized cannabis for recreational use. With only a handful of states that have not done step towards legalization, the future of cannabis seems bright and green. Cannabis is finding its way into television programs, sports and other family names. With most states that have legalized cannabis use somehow, it is clear that the vision of the general public of Marijuana has evolved dramatically from the days when the propaganda films now hilarious as Reefer Madness warned the US population of the "deadly" effects of the plant. In the following decades we have learned much more about the many medical benefits linked to this treatment once-taboo. But since its use becomes even more widespread and as thrusts for federal decriminalization can begin to spread, it is becoming more and more important, even, to take a look at what the future holds for cannabis in the United States. The wide acceptance of the doctors and social benefits of the use of cannabis is a relatively new concept in the United States. Although the first settlers had been encouraged once and at the end legally required to cultivate hemp (a type of cannabis used to make paper, fabric and other products), fell by favor once the production of cotton has increased a € " And as the population understood the psychoactive effects of the plant were so powerful as the economic ones. Starting from the 1800s, cannabis was used in medicinal dyes and other pharmaceutical preparations and has been widely available for purchase in general stores. This consumption lasted until the 1930s when, following prohibition, politicians and other groups used racism and prejudices based on socio-economic status to justify drug criminalization. Despite the restrictions and legal ramifications, the cannabis has slowly made its way into middle-class American life in half of the twentieth century, and this has stimulated gradual changes. The American attitude towards Cannabis began to relax again in the 1970s, when Oregon became the first state to decry the drug. Although decriminalization has not been used by legal marijuana, limited the sanctions for those who have been accused of cannabis possession for personal use. Rather than serving the prison time, which was previously the punishment they faced, the people who have been captured with up to a gram of cannabis were instead $ 100 for possession. A number of other states followed the cause, and in 1977, President Jimmy Carter had begun to push the Congress to decry the drug, emphasizing that the anti-cannabis laws were making the company and the cannabis more. However, conservative politicians, police officers and various social groups opposed decriminalization efforts, and cannabis was included in the list of illicit substances that President Ronald Reagan war on drugs tried to eliminate during the 1980s. Until 1996 California became the first state to legalize cannabis for medicinal purposes with its USE Act compassionate Year. in the late 1990s, Alaska, Oregon, Washington and the Columbia District had legalized cannabis for people who received prescriptions from authorized doctors. Then, over the years 2000, eight other states passed medical cannabis laws without falling into chaos, which could have helped facilitate the apprenticeship of the public. by 2010, the voters of the United States were to seriously rethink whether cannabis was the "transit drug" that many during the Reagan era had believed it to be. In 2012, Colorado and Washington became the first states to allow adults to legally purchase cannabis for recreational purposes. Currently, 15 states plus Washington D.C. have legalized recreational cannabis, while it is legal for medical use in 35 states and D.C. While the United States has come a long way in legalizing cannabis, it is still not as acceptable as many other countries. Canada, for example, legalized recreational cannabis at the federal level in 2018, following the lead of Uruguay, which became the first country in the world to legalize the plant for recreational purposes and sales in 2013. Mexico is ready to legalize recreational cannabis. In March 2021, the Mexican Congress passed a legalization bill. It then happens that the bill will pass to the Senate of Mexico and if the bill will pass to Andr  s Manuel L  pez Obrador, the President of Mexico. With both of your legally closest neighbors, could the United States be next? While most US states have at least legalized medical cannabis at the state level, the drug remains illegal under federal law. That said, it may not be forever, as laws such as the (MORE) Act are often under consideration by Congress. If passed, the bill would make cannabis federally legal by decriminalizing its production, distribution and possession and removing it from the Controlled Substances Act, which classifies and regulates prescriptions and other drugs. Unfortunately, the bill is not without its problems, as it would not prohibit individual states from punishing offenders for cannabis-related crimes if they chose to do so. That said, it would be a first step to help the country take a more progressive path and close the gap between the United States and the more than 30 countries in the world that have legalized cannabis for medical purposes. Many hope President-elect Joe Biden will help usher in an era of cannabis reform as his presidency progresses. While new changes by the incoming administration would probably not lead to general approval for recreational use, Biden expressed his support for both the decriminalization of the drug and the elimination of criminal records for people who have been convicted of cannabis-related crimes. Biden, along with Vice President-elect Kamala Harris, also supports the legalization of drugs at the federal level. Vice President-Elect Harris is also among the co-sponsors of the 2019 Marijuana Justice Act, which aimed to remove drugs from the federal list of controlled substances. In addition to supporting the At the highest level of the US government, Congress continues to push for reforms. At the beginning of December 2020, the House of Representatives approved a bill to "decriminalize marijuana and turn off the convictions related to the nonviolent marijuana." While much of the representatives' house is on board the legalization of cannabis, there are obstacles to overcome in the Senate, where the New York Times notes that the bill is "almost certainly condemned". The majority leader of the Senate Mitch McConnell has longed for a long time that a number of members of the conservative Senate are hesitant to proceed with federal decriminalization, a position that has a substantial block to progress. Because the country becomes more open on the use of cannabis, studies are constantly revealing the incredible number of medicinal benefits of the plant. According to the Harvard Medical School, the use of cannabidiol, or CBD, extracts - the non-psychoactive chemical compounds in a €
